With regard to the application by The Nascot Arms to vary its licensing criteria: I've been using the pub fairly frequently since the mid seventies and have only ever seen two "incidents" there. I would, therefore, have no particular problem with the extension to their opening hours.

I'd be less happy about seeing children in the bar later than they're currently allowed. I'm probably a little old-fashioned but I think that it's rather inappropriate. As the evening progresses people tend to imbibe a little more and their language can deteriorate, along with their tolerance. Modern parents don't seem to believe in controlling their children and the combination of ill-disciplined children and increasingly "relaxed" drinkers may well result in some harsh exchanges of words, if not more.

Paul Curtis.
